Psychologists and "feel good" writers tell us how important it is to believe in ourselves, have confidence, and feel secure. Few ever reach the ideal level of well being, but if they do, there is usually someone anxious to take them down a peg or two. Great accomplishments of long duration, as well as singular acts of kindness, triumph, and good intention, are equally vulnerable to the caustic comments of a few.

The critic may be ill advised, incorrect in their evaluation, or just plain vindictive, jealous, or cruel, but their comments often cut deeply. Opinions are like noses—everyone has one, not all are perfect, and some only acknowledge things that smell bad. Don't let someone else's evaluation of you or your actions destroy your confidence and self-worth.
